

On Fugitive Planning, Solidarity, and Co-Struggle: Towards an Abolitionist Narrative Therapy

“How should our work meet this particular moment in history?”

Dr. Travis Heath, Associate Professor, Metropolitan State University- Denver Campus

In this Spoken Word publication, Dr. Travis Heath talks about how the influence of Black scholars have had on his current thinking and practice as a narrative therapist. In particular, Dr. Heath addresses the importance of searching for new ideas, words, and language from anti-racist/anti-white supremacist activists to challenge, discomfort, and inspire a more radicalized narrative therapy. Through stories of his current practice, Dr. Heath offers us a glimpse of how he has taken up abolitionist and anti-white supremacist ideas in his practice with clients right now in this current moment.
